Are You Using the Right Pipeline Nozzles?

Understanding nozzles and how they work is a key step to cleaning a pipeline successfully and efficiently. Knowing how they work and what they do will ensure that you are getting the most out of your nozzle and shorten the overall cleaning process. Each nozzle is designed for a specific application and you don't want to waste time guessing which nozzle to use. If you are choosing nozzles that are not used for their intended purposes, then they won't be as effective.

It is important to understand the relationship between pressure and flow ratios to know what type of nozzle to use. You need to determine what material you are cleaning. In general, drain cleaning and debris removal require low pressure and high flow to move the material down the line. Hard materials, such as mortar and encrustation, require higher pressure and lower flow. As conditions change, you will want to change the nozzles. Most of the time you will use multiple nozzles as you clean a pipe.

Jet angles are another item to think about when selecting a nozzle. Jet angles in a 30 to 45-degree range provide minimum thrust. They are perfect for cleaning pipe walls with no impacted debris. Jet angles in a 0 to 10-degree range are designed for thrust to propel a nozzle up the line. These nozzles are designed to shoot up the lines fast to punch through root blockages and are good for moving debris. Jet angles in a 15 to 20-degree range are good at cleaning the walls, propelling the nozzle, and moving the debris. Many nozzles have a combination of jet angles to perform many functions at the same time. This will give you the ability to clean the walls, move debris, and provide the thrust. When selecting a nozzle, think about what you will be using it for.

If you would like more information or help with choosing the right nozzle, give us a call and one of our experienced sales reps will guide you in the right direction.
